

"I had wanted simply to convey to the reader by way of concrete example that life holds a potential meaning under any conditions, even the most miserable ones. And I thought that if the point were demonstrated in a situation as extreme as that in a concentration camp, my book might gain a hearing. I therefore felt responsible for writing down what I had gone through, for I thought it might be helpful to people who are prone to despair."

from Man's Search for Meaning
by Viktor Frankl

The entrance to the rear area of the camp of Auschwitz, author-psychologist Viktor Frankl's home as prisoner of conscience of the Third Reich.

Same sign's inscription on the entrance to hell.
